

The Burning Bush—Online article archive

The IRA Remains Silent About Victims' Graves

Despite the "sorrow" expressed by Sinn Féin leaders, Gerry Adams and Martin McGuinness, over the bombing of Omagh by their former colleagues who broke away and formed the "Real IRA", it ought to be known to all observers of life in this troubled land that the Roman Catholic families of those murdered by the IRA, for what they considered acts of betrayal of the republican cause, have still not been told where the bodies of their loved ones are. The list of victims is sizeable and extends back over the 30 years of the present troubles, but despite numerous appeals by the mothers and relatives of the victims, the IRA has so far refused to act. Such cruelty to their own will serve as a guide to the treatment Protestant "heretics" may expect from these monsters.