The Depths To Which The Church Of England Has Sunk

The Church of England is one of the most apostate bodies within Christendom. This is very evident with the revelation that two of its so-called "women priests" began their ministries as men and that the number of transsexual and transvestite perverts amongst its clerics is growing.

Two other "priests" are having sex change treatment, church sources have admitted. One has been forced by his bishop to take indefinite leave, but intends to seek a fresh appointment after his operation, as a woman priest. Many of these perverts meet with a number of lay Anglicans as part of a secret group called Sibyls, which is derived from the Greek word for prophetess. They hold private church services wearing female clothes.

Archbishop of Canterbury, George Carey, is trying to hold the denomination together in the face of divisions over sodomite clerics and the ordination of women. The issue of this latest disclosure of perversion within the Church of England may surface during the Lambeth conference in July, when Anglican bishops from across the world discuss church doctrine. The conference's steering committee will receive a confidential paper on transsexual clergy. It is believed to highlight the number of clerics who have changed gender or wish to, and calls for an open church discussion.

It has been reported in the press that at least 21 clergy in the Church of England consider themselves to be "transgendered". Fourteen are transvestites. Three are considering a sex change and are said by friends to be in a psychological "grey area". The church's decision to allow the ordination of women priests in 1992 is thought to have encouraged some priests to reveal their inclinations.

Speaking for the first time, a vicar in a large Church of England parish has described conducting acts of worship for Sibyls. He also told of his desire to dress and behave as a woman while serving a large parish. "I have taken services wearing women's clothes," he said.

The "priest" has been married for 25 years and has children. But he has consulted two psychiatrists, who confirmed that he had all the traits of a transsexual. He believes his bishop would try to remove him from the parish if he knew. "I would be difficult to sack, but there would be moral pressure on me to resign. I would have a nervous breakdown or commit suicide."

That such a state of affairs should prevail in the national church is indicative of the moral quagmire the nation has been led into by its ecumenical leaders. It also indicates that the return of Christ in judgment cannot be far away.

Even so, come, Lord Jesus , Revelation 22:20.
